Though gay-themed stories about "coming out" and accepting one's sexuality are not uncommon in many cultures, they are still rare in many conservative African nations. Considered a ground-breaking film in its native Guinea-Bissau, despite controversy, Mohamed Camara's Dakan is the first of its nation's films to directly address issues surrounding homosexuality. The story centers on the romance between two 20-year-old men, Manga and Sory who are first seen making love. When Manga tells his widowed mother about his love for Sory, who is busy contending with his outcast status, the two never see each other again. Manga's mother then uses witchcraft to cleanse her son and cast Sory out. Time passes and eventually Manga begins to date a girl. But it soon becomes apparent that try as he might, he cannot get over Sory.

For this remarkable experimental film, the provocative avant-garde legend Stephen Dwoskin gathered a group of performers and filmed them as they explored their fantasies over a period of five days: a project that now sounds outrageous. Ceremonial gowns and make-up here not only evoke the eroticism of European horror movies but also the tension between performance and intimacy. Jonas Mekas called it 'theatre of life'...
